State Supreme Court disbars Allentown lawyer for breaking rule Report says he falsely accused judge of "domestic terrorism.'

Allentown lawyer Eugene Wrona has been disbarred by the Pennsylvania Supreme Court for falsely accusing a judge of "domestic terrorism" and fixing the outcome of a child support case, according to court documents.

Wrona, 65, continues to practice as a lawyer, saying the disbarment on July 29 is invalid and unconstitutional, and plans to file an appeal Monday. He did not specify which court.

The Pennsylvania Disciplinary Board had unanimously recommended Wrona's disbarment March 31, saying Wrona had violated five rules of professional conduct, including committing perjury and falsely accusing Lehigh County Judge Alan Black and other court staffers of criminal misconduct.

Wrona, who was admitted to practice law in 1993, had represented a man in 1997 who was not paying ordered child support. It was his first court case as primary attorney, and Lehigh County Judge William Ford found Wrona's client in contempt.

Wrona then filed to modify the child support order, and Lehigh County Judge Edward Reibman ordered an increase in support; Wrona requested a new hearing on that petition and came before Black, who affirmed the increase. Wrona appealed Black's decision to the Superior Court and filed several complaints with that court saying statements had been omitted from the transcripts and audiotapes of hearings and court proceedings.

Black denied three motions by Wrona to correct the record. In 2000 and 2001, Wrona accused court employees of perjury and attempted to have Black disqualified from the case, charging that he had a "personal bias or prejudice" against Wrona's client. He filed complaints with the Judicial Conduct Board accusing Black of "criminal misconduct" and fixing the outcome of the custody case, court records show.

According to the disciplinary board's report, Wrona sent a letter to the Pennsylvania Attorney General in 2003 that accused Black of "domestic terrorism," and a letter to the governor of Massachusetts in 2004 calling Black despicable and accusing him of doing more harm than the Sept. 11 terrorists. The documents did not give an explanation.

Although other lawyers charged with making false accusations have faced five-year suspensions, the board said Wrona "has no background of steady competent legal work to help mitigate the severity of his unwarranted behavior."

In its 23-page report, the disciplinary board said Wrona was unfit to practice law. "He was prepared to fight his case in any way possible, including making false and injurious accusations against a judge in a persistent manner through a number of years and to a variety of audiences," it wrote.

Wrona railed against the disciplinary board, Reibman, Black and the "corrupt" Pennsylvania judicial system Thursday, saying he has been denied due process.
